AREADING • Read the text.

A group of teenagers in a small town decided to help the river near their school. During a science lesson, they learned that plastic waste can harm fish and birds. Their teacher suggested starting a local project.

Every second Saturday, the students walk along the riverbank, collect rubbish and record the different materials they find. They never enter the water and always wear protective gloves. Last month they collected twenty bags of waste and sent their findings to the town council. They also created posters encouraging visitors to use bins. If more people join the project, the students will organise an environmental exhibition. Team leader Grace says small actions can make a big difference when a community works together.
